That's a big turnaround from the last three years, when the industry sold more electricity to its utility customers than it generated from nuclear power plants. But that victory could be short-lived. The total nuclear industry lost about 60 percent of its market value from 2008 through 2010, and it has been dogged by budget cuts, competition from natural gas and resistance to building new plants in some regions. Wind and solar generation are pushing down wholesale power prices, a trend that could reverse the near-record annual increase in electricity sold to customers last year. And public opposition to nuclear power could grow if the industry follows through on a new effort to eliminate a state requirement for approval of new nuclear power plants. Venezuela's embattled president is scrambling to find funds to pay for medical care for his ailing wife — even after her own family said they would foot the bill. Nicolas Maduro's wife, Cilia Flores, is under the care of a specialist in New York, but he has to travel to the city every two weeks to be with her, CNN reports. And that's putting a major strain on the country's already-stressed medical system. "We're still holding out hope that Cilia will be able to return home," Maduro told a hospital in Caracas on Friday, as he waited to give the latest update on his wife's medical condition. He said that she would be flying back to Caracas soon, but didn't say if he would accompany her. He has been appearing before TV cameras in recent days, also answering questions on the whereabouts of his vice president, who has gone missing. The government has repeatedly delayed payments to hospitals and doctors, accusing them of billing for care they haven't given. Maduro has not given any details on how his wife will pay for her treatment. Flores' doctor in New York, Juan Carlos Castillo, told CNN that he couldn't comment on the specifics of the case because of medical privacy laws. But he said the costs for a private patient in New York can run from $3,000 to $20,000 a month. Flores' family in Caracas told a local news outlet that they would pay for her treatment, calling her a "national treasure" and adding that she "does not belong to Nicolas Maduro or any other person." But Maduro's detractors have long criticized him for not being more visible in the medical sector — and his wife's health is one of several examples of the way his government runs. His opponent, Juan Guaido, is considered the legitimate president by many in the international community. As The New York Times noted this week, Maduro has spent much of his time in recent months at his desk, as he fights a political battle against Guaido. And he hasn't been known to visit a hospital in years, even though Venezuela's health care system is crumbling. Flores has a long history of health problems, including a recent bout with cancer.
